"STRIKES" are, at best, but doubtful when the strikers resort to unprovoked violence they forfelt all claim to sympathy. The employes in the gas works in New York city had a right to refuse to work for the wages given them provided they had not contracted for a specified time at such wages. Three rules, then, we have always contended, must be enforced as a defence against the usurpations which are gradually destroying our social and political integrity and retarding our progress: First, the government must assert its undoubted right to inspect and supervise the affairs of all the corporations upon which it confers special powers. Second, the government must enforce absolute publicity of the affairs of all such corporations, so that the pubmust require their directors to be chosen by the cumulative system; so that a minority of the stockholders may be represented. By such means only can these important agents be made to serve the public honestly, and capital and labor be chaured against the abuses which are now surely accumulating with fearful rapidity.

What to do with the Rallroads.

(From the N. Y. Post)

This brings us to the pith of the controversies which now agitate the whole country: the remedy for the oppressions and robberies is with the governments which create the railroad corporations. But the radical error at this point is in supposing that in order to regulate them the government must own them. If we complain of the extortion and inefficiency of the telegraph, the railroad and the limits of any reservation, and within the jurisdiction of the two States, and of the claims to any reservation, and within the jurisdiction of the two States, and of the claims to any arrangement to any arrangement that the Modoes. I do not question with the Modoes. I do not question the right or power of the general Government to make any arrangement that they should make such as to secure permanent peace together with a liberal and just treatment of the Indians.
